Northwestern

Spotlight on Safety

Volume 6, Issue10 October 2022

Fire Prevention

October9-15 is NationalFire PreventionWeek, and a greattimetodiscusshowtopreventfires Fires can occuranywhereat any time, and they are one of the most dangerous workplace hazards The OccupationalSafety and Health Administration(OSHA) reports an average of more than 200workplacefires per day, and an average of more than 5,000 people injured by workplace fires annually. Northwestern'sFire Prevention Program provides guidance on identifyingand reducingpotentiafirehazards on campustoensure yoursafety, thesafetyof your colleaguesand community and the protection universityproperty

To prevent fires, you should first understand what is required for a fire to ignite and stay burning The followingproperties re needed to starta fire

Oxygen, which is plentiful in most work areas

Fuel, such mehaper Dargencies Fuel, such mehaper Dargencies

StayPositiveKeepthefocusonwhat ange donete create safeworkplacesteadffocusinonwhat as gonewronig the past

Sharea StoryAskfora StoryStoryCelling Server and methodto conveyinformations to restrom your employeæsakethetopievermoræelatable

Fire safetyin the workplace

Fires can originate from many sources in the workplace and can spread rapidly in the right conditions. Here are some examples of sources of fires in the workplace and how to prevent them

Welding, cutting, and brazing (e.g., hot work)tasks produce flames or sources of ignition in good never be blocked by equipmentor materials

Learn more: CompleteFire ExtinguisherHot Work Permit

Safety at Home